Older adults, unlike the younger population, are continually reminded every day of their health. They may wake up in the morning feeling stiff or during the day find their energy does not go as far as it once did. Preventive health care, although it cannot slow down the aging process, can play a crucial part in detecting diseases early, minimizing the effects of existing problems, and preventing further complications of the individual's health status.

As greater numbers of people enter the age group of those 65 older, preventive health care can decrease the risks of morbidity and mortality, thereby improving the quality of life. Consider these statistics: in the community, older adults comprise about 10 percent of the total population, 14 percent have their own household, 81 percent live in a home with relatives, while only 5 percent are institutionalized; although 80 percent of the older adults have one or more chronic conditions, over 82 percent of those not living in institutions have no limitations in mobility, despite their chronic conditions; and life expectancies are now 81 years for women and 78 years for men.
