With the aim of making Taiwan an English-Mandarin bilingual nation by 2030, the government is now implementing various programs to significantly increase the public's English proficiency level. The policy's overarching goal is, firstly, to bolster the people's international competitiveness by strengthening their English skills, and secondly to create a better environment for economic activities on a global scale, thus elevating the nation's economic development. As well-meaning as the policy is, it has also sparked much criticism. Some worry that the plan might weaken people's command of their own native language, and some argue that improving language skills does not necessarily lead to better competitiveness.

In your opinion, is bilingual nation a goal worth pursuing? If so, what are your reasons? And if not, what alternatives do you propose? Please answer in an essay of 300-400 words, and apply an appropriate title. The essay should include an introduction, body paragraphs, and a conclusion. You will be graded according to the content, grammar, word choice, and organization of your writing.
